INTRODUCTION

On 29 October 2004 in Rome, Heads of State and Governments from the 25 Member States of the European Union signed a Treaty establishing a Constitution for the Union. For the countries that make up the Union, the process of ratifying the text would begin from that moment. Nine countries<sup>1</sup> have until now decided on direct consultation rather than ratifying the European Constitution via the parliamentary route.

On 20 February 2005, the Spanish became the first Europeans to go to the polls for a referendum on the Constitution's text. With 76.72% voting 'Yes' in a 42.32% voter turnout, the Treaty establishing a European Constitution obtained the approval of the Spanish people in a consultative referendum, a process which has only been used on three previous occasions: the ratification of 'la Ley de Reforma Política' (Political Reform Law, 1976), the Spanish Constitution (1978), and to decide upon the country's continued membership of NATO (1986).

For the first time in their democratic history, Spaniards could directly use their democratic tool to express an opinion on the process of European integration.

Although support for the Treaty has been huge, a turnout rate in the referendum which was slightly below that observed in recent European elections (45.94%) is viewed with some concern by the European institutions as well as by other countries that have announced similar referenda.

The lack of information and the prompt announcement of the referendum are some of the criticisms raised by Spanish citizens. However, it is necessary to go further in order to understand the key factors in the result and to take from it the necessary lessons with regard to the next two years<sup>2</sup>, a period during which the 25 Member States should ratify the Treaty.

Against this background, the European Commission's Directorate-General Press and Communication decided to carry out a post-referendum study amongst the Spanish population with the right to vote in order to understand (among other matters) the determining factors in abstention, the reasoning of those voting against, and the socio-demographic and political profile of voters and abstainers as well as the supporters and opponents of the Constitution.

On 21 and 22 February, that is to say immediately after the referendum, EOS Gallup Europe and its partner institute in Spain, TNS-Demoscopia, carried out 2014 interviews amongst Spaniards aged 18 and over, counted in the census and with the right to vote.

<sup>2</sup> If all countries have ratified the text in time, the European Constitution will entry into force on 1 November 2006

The following topics will be covered:

- Turnout in the referendum, profile of abstainers and determining factors in their abstention;
- Information on the referendum and the campaign issues;
- Results of the vote and motivating factors;
- Actual knowledge of the text and its influence on the result;
- Collateral effects of the results.

A detailed analysis of the principal results obtained will be developed over the course of the report. Along with the socio-demographic characteristics of respondents, we have also included ideological and political characteristics such as electoral behaviour in a referendum (voted "Yes", voted "No", voted "Blank" and "Did not vote"), the actual knowledge of the Constitution, as well as party proximity.

We have kept the original Spanish names of the main political parties in Spain, which are: PSOE (Socialist party), PP (Conservative party), IU (Communist), CiU (Catalan Nationalist party-centre), PNV (Basque Nationalist party-centre), ERC (Catalan Nationalist party-left) and EA (Basque Nationalist party-centre).

It is worth noting the small size of the respondent base for nationalist parties and therefore any data coming from these figures must be interpreted with extreme caution.

The sample size of this survey amounts to 2014 respondents. The methodology used is that of the Eurobarometer Flash surveys (telephone interviews).

A technical note, pertaining to the way TNS-Demoscopia conducted interviews is found at the end of this analysis. It provides further details on interviewing methods as well as statistical margins of error.

1. Analysis of turnout in the referendum.

Voter turnout in a democratic system, whatever the voting process, is in itself a figure that is difficult to interpret. When talking of a mechanism for direct democracy, analysis becomes even more complicated due to the high risk of falling prey to interpretations based on the logic of representational rather than direct democracy.

In any case, at 57.7%, abstention in the Spanish referendum was considerable and is worth studying in detail since there is a risk that this might be erroneously interpreted as a negative vote or rejection of the Constitution as well as being susceptible to use by those claiming to devalue the result.

1.1. Low turnout levels: Socio-demographic and political profile, those who didn't vote.

In this chapter we will proceed to analyse the socio-demographic and political profile of those who didn't vote and, where possible, try to discover the reasons which led them not to vote on the 20 February.

Source questionnaire: Q1

-A record level of abstention, particularly amongst the youngest section of the electorate-

Almost six out of every ten Spaniards with the right to vote abstained on Sunday 20 February. This electoral absenteeism, present in practically every socio-demographic segment identified, reached extremely worrying levels among the youngest section of the electorate, between the ages of 18 and 24, a group in which only one in every four persons interviewed turned out to vote (73% abstained while 27% turned out to vote).

Analysing the other socio-demographic groups identified, we observe the following:

- Manual and self-employed workers were the professions with the highest levels of abstention (67% and 64% respectively).
- By educational level achieved, those who finished studying between the ages of 16 and 20 were least likely to turnout to vote, especially compared to the less educated segment of the population (63% abstainers in the former compared to the 53% recorded amongst the latter).
- By locality, turnout was lower in medium-sized and small cities.
- Hardly any differences existed between the genders. All in all, women were slightly more reluctant to vote (59% did not turn out to vote compared to 56% of men).

- Turnout characterised by a marked difference between generations -

As illustrated by the graph, while 73% of young voters decided to stay at home, a majority of interviewees aged 55 or over turned out to vote.

A directly proportional relationship between turnout and age may be a reflection of differences between these two generations in terms of political culture.

In the 55 or older category, there is a mixture of those who suffered through the Civil War and those who lived with its consequences.

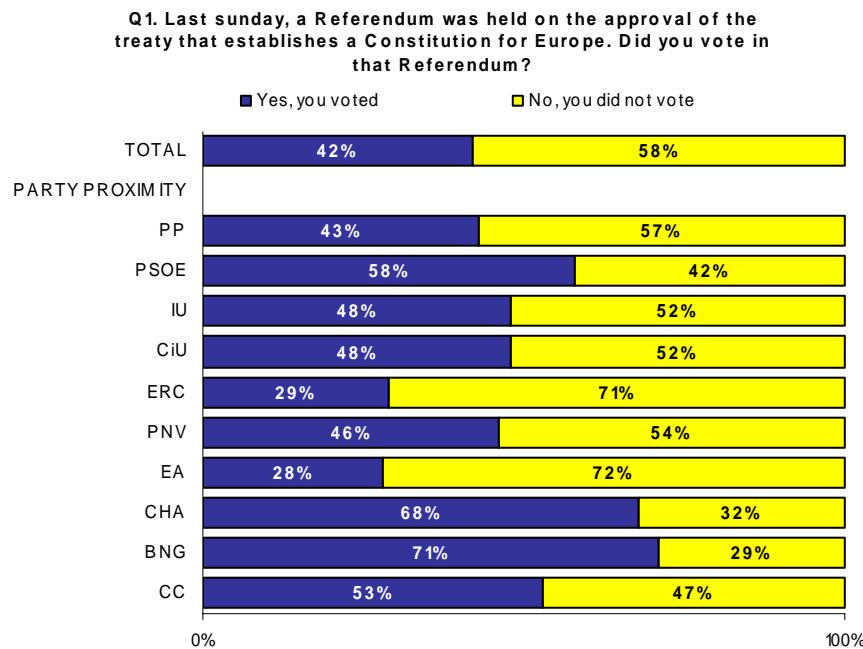

This is a generation that, after experiencing 40 years of dictatorship, enthusiastically embraced the transitional political process and integration into Europe.

It must not be forgotten that belonging to the European Union has been seen in Spain as one of the elements, if not the key factor, in the consolidation of the democratic system and economic growth.

This generation's turnout in the 20th of February referendum could be interpreted as the deeply pro-European expression of a proportion of citizens who are particularly involved in areas which affect the Union and who are extremely grateful for the role it has played in the recent history of their country.

From a more ideological analytical perspective, who made up the abstaining public?

It is odd to note that although both of the major parties, PSOE and PP, campaigned for a yes vote, only the Government party, the PSOE, managed to get most of its supporters to the polls. In effect, the pattern of turnout in the two parties is inverted: while 58% of those with an affinity to PSOE turned out to vote on the 20 February, practically the same proportion (57%) of PP sympathisers, the main opposition party, abstained.

This data is extremely important and revealing: throughout the campaign both sides accused the other of using the referendum for political party purposes.

In fact, the opposition is using the low turnout rate to talk of a split in the Government and to present this as irrefutable proof of the poor opinion which the near 13 million members of the electorate who shunned the polling station have of the last 10 months of Socialist Government. On the other hand, some members of the Socialist party accused the opposition of having deliberately conducted an ambiguous campaign in order to encourage abstention.

The result is in any case proof of the ease with which the logic of direct democracy can, in the context of extreme political party confrontations, be affected by the political mechanisms and behaviour of participative democracy itself.

1.1.2 Reasons for abstention.

4 months passed between the signing of the Constitutional Treaty in Rome on 29 October and the Spanish referendum. One recurring question, which acquires special attention in the light of the results, is to what extent the Government and other involved bodies allowed sufficient time to inform the public. Is poor turnout the fruit of a hastily announced referendum and insufficient information? The study reported convincing data in this regard.

Source questionnaire: Q2

- Lack of information and insufficient political campaigning-

The results of the survey suggested that 28% of abstentions were supposedly involuntary, i.e. attributable to circumstantial reasons (illness, travel, administrative difficulties etc.)

Leaving this to one side, a lack of information is the argument put forward by 30% of interviewees. If we add to this percentage the responses of those who criticised the absence of public debates and electoral campaigning (10%) the result is that just over 40% of abstainers blamed insufficient information on Europe and the Constitution, probably as a result of a rather short campaign.

Lack of interest in politics influenced 13% of the public, together with 8% who give scepticism with the voting process as their reason for not voting: "voting doesn't have any result / doesn't change anything".

Only 3% would have shunned the polling station due to lack of interest in the Union, with a similar proportion doing so due to lack of interest in the text of the Constitution.

Lastly, 9% cited the predictability of the result, the "Yes" victory, as taking away their will to vote.

If we analyse the results from a socio-demographic perspective we see that lack of information is put forward particularly strongly by women (33%) as well as the young (36%) and interviewees living in small or medium-sized urban centres (38%).

1.1.3 Relationship between lack of information and turnout

It is worth examining further the relationship that seems to exist between levels of information and turnout in the referendum.

Source questionnaire: Q6a)

One out of every two interviewees declared that they did not have all the information necessary to make a decision before going to vote (52% were quite or very much in disagreement with the statement: "Before voting in the referendum, you had all necessary information in order to make a choice").

If we read these results in the light of turnout, we see that this proportion reaches 62% for abstainers, as opposed to 32% who abstained while theoretically having all the information they required. However, amongst those who turned out to vote a majority affirmed that they had all the elements they needed to make their decision.

-Turnout, directly linked to the knowledge of the text-

Taking a deeper examination of these results, it is interesting to study electoral behaviour with regard to interviewees' knowledge of the Constitution's content.

To analyse the results we have constructed a variable based on answers given to question 8<sup>3</sup>, a quiz type question used to measure Spaniards' actual knowledge with regard to some of the measures contained in the Constitutional text. A more detailed analysis of this question will be done in chapter 3<sup>4</sup>.

Interviewees who gave 5 or 6 correct answers have been classified as "Very well informed"; those who gave 3 or 4 have been included in the category "Well informed"; people who only gave 1 or 2 are to be found in the "Poorly informed" group; and those who gave no correct answers are considered "Very poorly informed".

Later, this index of knowledge was cross-referenced against the whole of the study data.

We shall now analyse the behaviour of these four groups in terms of turnout in the referendum. Although one out of every two interviewees in the "Very well informed" group took part in the referendum of 20th of February, this proportion falls to one out of three among those to be found at the other end of the scale.

<sup>3</sup> Q8: For each of the following statements, tell me if, in your opinion, it is true or false. It is planned in the European Constitution that... :

- a) The position of a Foreign Affairs Minister of the European Union will be created
- b) At least one million citizens of the European Union can request the adoption of a European law
- c) The President of the European Council is directly elected by European citizens
- d) A direct European tax will be created
- e) National citizenship will disappear
- f) A member state can leave the European Union if it wishes to do so

If we analyse the arguments of those who explain their "desertion" of the polling station, we see that "unforeseen circumstances" and lack of information obtain similar results among the two groups with most knowledge of the text (24% and 27% in the first case, 26% and 28% in the second).

On the other hand, the absence of discussion is relatively more important amongst those who failed to vote despite knowing most about the text (12%) compared to abstainers who possessed practically no knowledge of the Constitution's contents (8%).

1.1.4 Turnout in the referendum and electoral behaviour in the last European elections.

As has already been said, the referendum on the European Constitution is the first direct public consultation on Europe held in Spain. The previous data on European consultation relates to elections to the Strasbourg Parliament held on the 13th of June last. Do similarities exist between the behaviour of the Spanish electorate at that time and that displayed on 20th of February?

Source questionnaire: Q1 and Q11

The main press headlines the day after the referendum referred to similar turnout levels (43.2% and 45.1%) in the European elections the previous June. Some socialist leaders, including the ex-President of the European Parliament, Enrique Barón, maintained even before the vote that a turnout similar to the threshold of that obtained during the last elections to the Parliament in Strasbourg should be considered a success.

Without entering into this sort of judgment, the following table illustrates the existence of similarities between the two electoral events: on the one hand, 40% of the electorate abstained from the referendum and also did so in the election of the 13th of June. This means that of the 100% of those who abstained this time, around 70% had not turned out in the European Elections. We may also observe that this group is especially large among interviewees aged between 18 and 24, where almost 6 out of every 10 abstained on both occasions.

	Total	Age
		18-24	25-39	40-54	55 & +

TOTAL	100%	100%	100%	100%	100%

1.1.5 The late launch of the campaign

We have seen that 10% of abstainers blame this decision on an inadequate electoral campaign and the lack of public discussion of the text. However, far from being just the complaint of abstainers, the study demonstrates that this is a general reproach from the Spanish people.

Source questionnaire: Q7

Nearly half of those interviewed, 46% to be precise, thought that discussion of the European Constitution started too late in Spain. Only 13% thought, on the contrary, that this started too early while 22% thought it began at the right time.

Criticism of the way the debate was organised is largely independent of the political sympathies of interviewees and the way they voted. Amongst the "Yes" voters 40% thought the discussion did not start early enough. Amongst sympathisers of the main organisations campaigning in favour of the text, PSOE and PP, this percentage rises to 44% and 49% respectively.

It is important to point out that even among those who knew most about the content of the text, a majority believed that the campaign should have started earlier (51%).

Although this applies to all sectors studied, it is necessary to highlight the more important significance amongst those who were in favour of a "No" vote: 6 out of every 10 of those who expressed their rejection of the Constitution at the polling station believed the debate started too late.

1.1.6 When the decision to vote was taken

Source questionnaire: Q4

Whether or not it was sufficient, the campaign appears to have fulfilled its role for a significant percentage of voters: in effect 39% claim to have taken a decision on their vote during the course of the campaign.

If we add to these the 15% who claim to have decided during the week running up to the ballot and the further 10% who waited until the day of the vote, the result is that the information disseminated during the campaign had an effect on more than 6 out of every 10 voters.

Lastly, 35% knew which way they would vote from the moment the ballot was called.

[IF VOTED IN Q1] : Q4. Can you tell me roughly when did you make up your mind how you would vote in the Referendum on the European Constitution?

In conclusion to this first chapter, there are three lessons to be learned from Spanish turnout in the referendum:

On one hand the ballot and, specifically, the abstention of the electorate may easily be used from the perspective of internal party squabbles and as an attack on the Government.

On the other hand, information is, as we have seen, crucial when it comes to mobilising the electorate: abstention appears to thrive in segments that know little about the Constitution and, in general, abstainers criticise the lack of information when explaining their failure to turn out to the polling stations.

Lastly, a significant segment of the Spanish population appears to be distancing itself from European topics, which is clearly reflected in the relationship between abstentions in the European elections and in the referendum. This distancing from or lack of interest in European politics is to be found particularly amongst the youngest voters.

2. Analysis of the results.

As national surveys had predicted, the European Constitution was approved by a little over three quarters of voters (77%) as opposed to only 17% against and 6% of blank ballot slips.

2.1. A clear Yes to the European Constitution

Source questionnaire: Q3

-Favourable votes a majority in all socio-demographic sectors-

Amongst actual voters, every group identified in terms of socio-demographic variables voted "Yes" to the treaty establishing a European Constitution.

From this analytical perspective, two results were especially significant: firstly, the extraordinary level of support for the Constitutional text among older voters, who were also the group most likely to turnout.

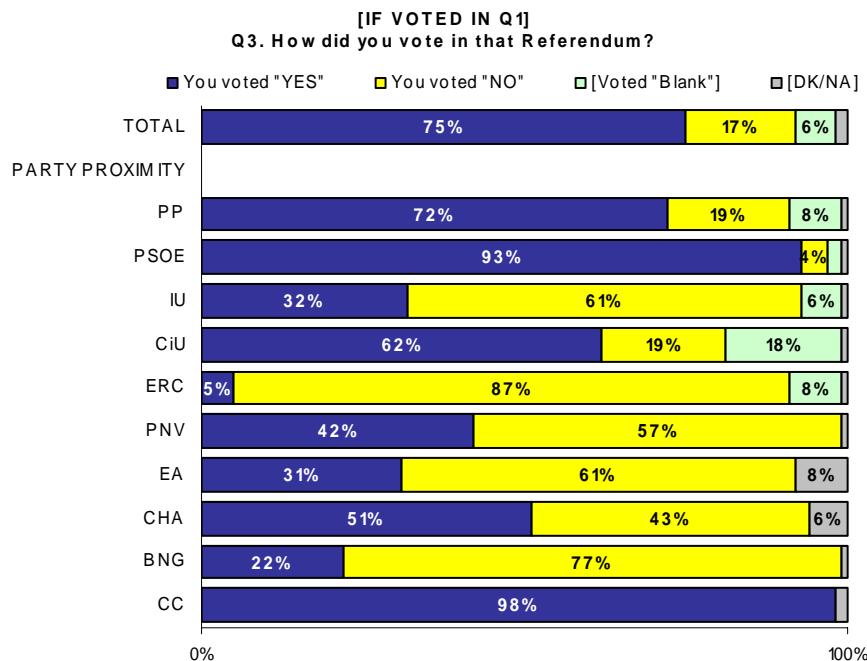

Secondly, we observe that the youngest section of the electorate is not only the least likely to turnout but is also the segment in which opposition to the Treaty has found its strongest voice, albeit in the minority: 38% of interviewees aged between 18 and 24 who went to the polling station voted "No".

Analysing the vote in terms of party affiliation, the result shows a practically unanimous majority of favourable votes amongst participating supporters of PSOE (93% of voters, 55% if we take members into account).

Similarly, among PP followers who voted, almost three out of every four (72%) expressed their support for the Treaty (the proportion amongst members being 32%).

In this last group, we observe that in spite of their leaders' approval of the Constitution, virtually 20% of those who decided to vote on 20th of February voted against the Treaty.

The opposite phenomenon can be observed among supporters of the Communist Coalition IU; practically one third between IU followers who turned up at the polling station voted "Yes", i.e. in the opposite way from that indicated by this political group.

Although the weakness of the respondent base data obliges us to be extremely cautious, it appears that the same effects are reproduced amongst followers of nationalist organisations not campaigning for independence, such as CiU and PNV, which also campaigned in favour of the Treaty.

This statement seems to be confirmed by analysing the "No" results in Autonomous Communities. According to data from the Spanish Interior Ministry, the "No" vote was 11% higher in Catalonia and 16% higher in the Basque Country<sup>5</sup>.

In both cases there are structural and clearly political reasons to explain this result: both the Catalonian and Basque party systems are different from those in the rest of Spain and count with more political organisations.

<sup>5</sup> In the Basque Country the "No" vote received 33.66% of the vote, while in Catalonia it reached 28.04%.

In the case of the Basque Country, we find more political organisations in the "No" camp than in any other region: the Batasuna radicals, and the nationalist organisations EA and Aralar). In Catalonia two left-wing parties that experienced a significant advance in the last general elections, ERC and ICV, campaigned for a "No" vote.

Moreover, in both cases, the most important nationalist parties, the PNV (which presides over the Basque autonomous government) and CiU, displayed internal differences which led to a delay in promoting the "Yes" vote.

2.2. Knowledge of the text and its effect on the vote.

May we conclude that knowledge of the Constitution's contents influenced the result of the vote as well as turnout?

-A slightly less clear correlation between the "Yes" vote and information about the text-

When we analyse the result of the vote compared to accurate knowledge of the text we observe that the influence this might have had on the "Yes" vote turns out to be relatively less clear than that observed in terms of electoral mobilisation.

Looking at responses given, we can confirm that although 37% of the interviewees' best informed about the Constitution voted "Yes", this proportion falls to 24% amongst those who had no knowledge of it.

However, translating these results into percentages of voters does not appear to present such clear differences: taking the results with caution due to the small respondent base from which they come, we see that in the first group the "Yes" supporters represent 74% while at the other extreme of the scale the result is very similar at 70%.

2.3. The key to the vote

Source questionnaire: Q5

-People voted more for Europe than the Constitution-

The generational characteristics of voter turnout and the general criticism of the campaign seem to confirm - as stated at the beginning of the report - that the vote was not the product of an effective and informative campaign but rather reflected reasons of compromise and Europhilia.

If for one out of every three Spanish voters the key factor in their decision to vote was their general attitude towards the European Union (33%), a slightly smaller proportion (26%) claimed to have turned out at the polling station because of their opinion on the European Constitution.

To a lesser extent, the campaign conducted by those wishing to promote the "Yes" vote turned out to be decisive for 16% of voters while that put forward by supporters of a "No" vote played a key role for only 4% of voters.

From a socio-demographic analytical perspective, opinion of the Union was relatively, the most important factor in almost all sectors.

This is slightly more true for men (35%), interviewees aged between 40 and 54 (37%), those aged 55 or over (34%), voters who had studied full-time for longer (38%) and employees (39%).

The European Constitution itself appears to be the main factor mentioned by the youngest section of voters: almost one in three highlighted this as the key factor in their decision to vote.

In keeping with the results of the vote, the data suggests that the "Yes" campaign seems to have been slightly more decisive for the older portions of the electorate while the message coming from the "No" camp, although less important than other factors, found slightly more sympathy amongst the 18-24 age group.

The pro-Europe or gratitude vote is confirmed when we analyse the results cross-referenced to ideological and voting variables.

- Opinion of the European Union was the key factor for 4 in 10 voters who supported the text.
- Similarly it was the most important factor for supporters of majority parties, which campaigned for a "Yes" vote (37% amongst Socialists and a little less, 32%, amongst PP voters).
- When cross-referencing results with knowledge of the text we see that, for those who knew most about the contents of the Constitution, opinions about it mattered much less than general opinions about the European Union (27% compared to 42%).

Opinions about the Constitution appear, however, to have influenced supporters of the "No" vote above all: for a relative majority (35%) this was the key factor.

This fact appears to be confirmed when we cross-reference the results with party affinities among interviewees: 32% of IU sympathisers and in general the majority<sup>6</sup> of those who declared themselves close to nationalist parties that campaigned against the Constitution (ERC and EA) claimed that their opinion of the Constitution had played a decisive role when deciding on their vote.

3. The key to the referendum.

Was this a "punishment" abstention? Is the "No" camp profoundly anti-European? How do Spaniards measure the consequences of being the first to express their opinion on the European Constitution at the polling station? These are some of the key questions that we will attempt to clear up over the next few pages.

3.1. Specifics: the importance of the European Union

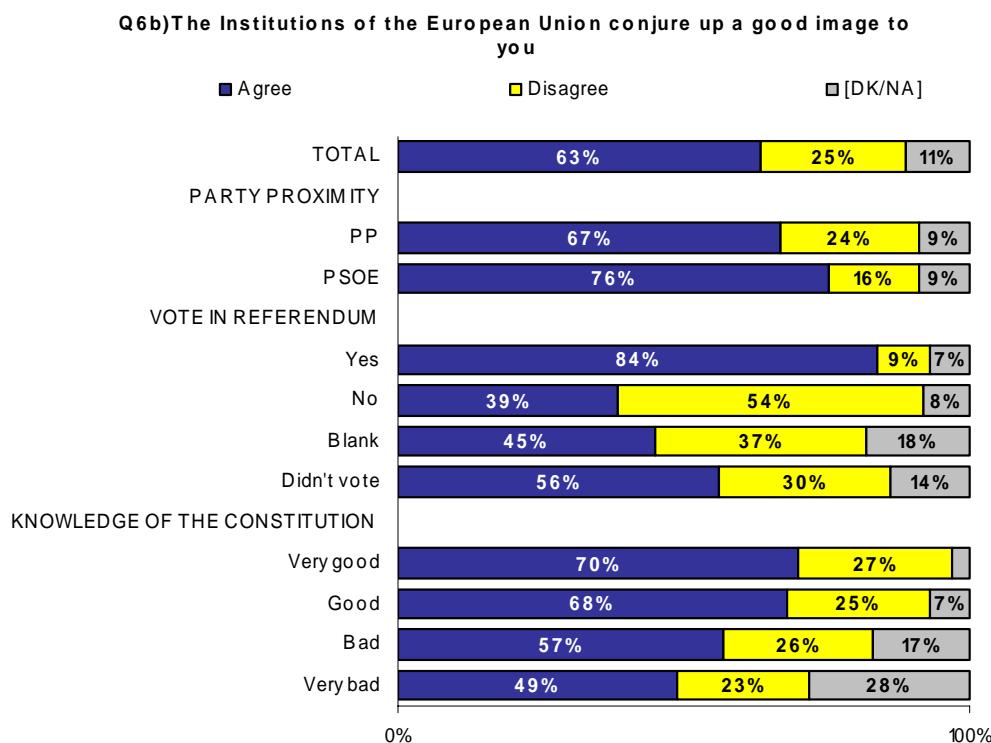

Source questionnaire: Q6b); Q6h)

-The pro-European stance of the Spanish, built on a positive image of European institutions and an extremely positive opinion of belonging to the Union-

One of the conclusions we can take from the study is the pro-European stance of the Spaniards who voted on 20th of February.

If opinion of the European Union was decisive in the political decision to vote, we should add that this opinion is built upon a very positive image of the European institutions.

The European institutions have a positive image among more than 6 out of every 10 Spaniards interviewed. This opinion is clearly stronger amongst those who voted "Yes" (84%) and among sympathisers with the two main political forces (67% among the PP and 76% for PSOE sympathisers).

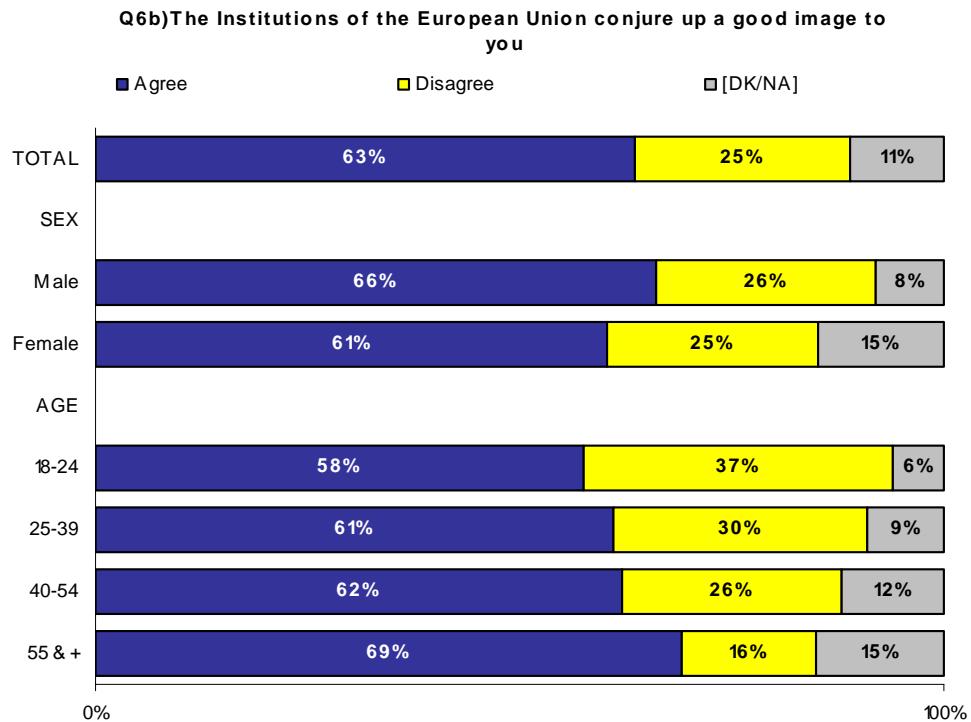

Despite the fact that support for this statement fell among abstainers, more than one in two (56%) still have a positive opinion of Europe and its institutions.

The positive judgment falls, naturally, amongst the "No" supporters. All in all, we observe that a significant proportion of these do not seem especially anti-European: 4 in 10 have a positive view of European institutions.

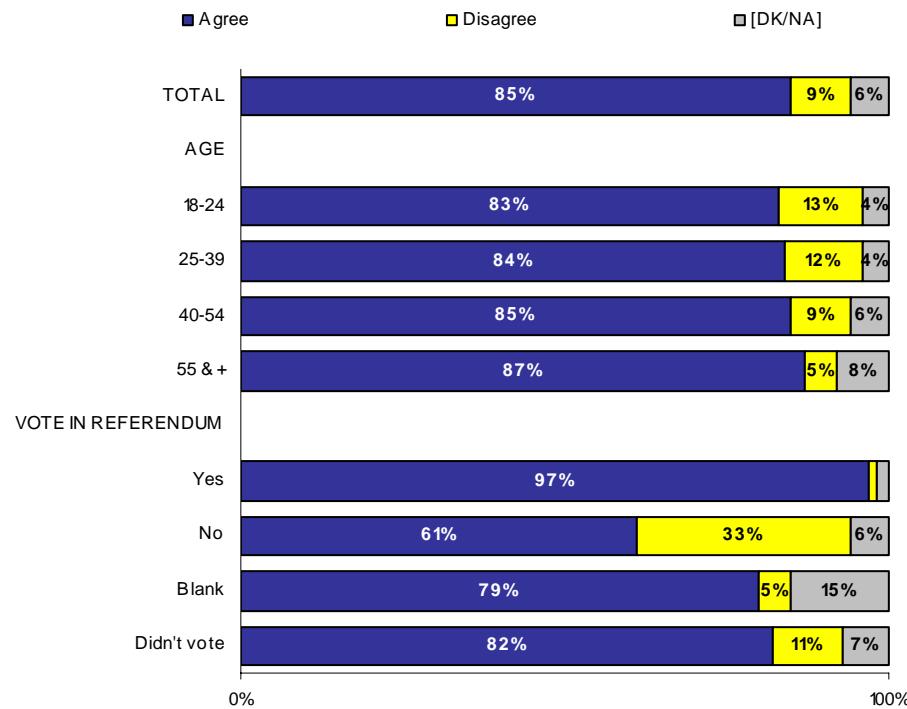

It is necessary to underline once more the role played by information. In this particular case, the level of agreement with the statement appears to be directly related to the interviewees' knowledge of the text of the Constitution: although 7 in 10 interviewees from the best informed segments approve of it, the proportion falls to 57% among those who possess a mediocre knowledge and 49% among those who know nothing about the Constitution's contents.

From a socio-demographic perspective, we must add that even though a clear majority were in agreement in every group identified, disagreement – and thus a potentially more negative view of Europe – was expressed by almost four out of every five of the young voters interviewed (37% to be exact).

Logically, we should emphasise the positive reading of these results, given the importance that positive opinions have even for those least likely to be in favour. Spanish anti-Europeans, in fact, appear to be so "reluctant". This is at least the conclusion drawn when interviewees take stock of Spain's membership of the European Union.

Q6h) Spain's membership of the European Union is a good thing

Almost 9 in 10 interviewees (85%) view Spain's membership of the Union positively. Agreement on this statement predominates in every socio-demographic segment identified, and is even largely supported by 83% of interviewees aged between 18 and 24.

From a more ideological perspective, recognition of the benefits derived by Spain from its membership of the Union is independent of the political sympathies of the interviewee and from the way they voted on the 20th of February:

- Among organisations against the Constitution such as the IU, 3 out of 4 sympathisers share this opinion.
- 6 in 10 "No" supporters have a positive view of Spanish membership.

3.2 Factors related to the European Constitution

Source questionnaire: Q6g)

-Abstention from the referendum: far from a form of political statement against the European Construction-

6 in 10 Spaniards interviewed consider the Constitution to be indispensable to European Construction. The deep political significance of the Constitution, critical to those who supported it with their vote (88%), is also recognised by the majority of abstainers and, paradoxically, by over 1 in 3 supporters of the "No" vote (36%).

Q6g) The European Constitution is essential in order to pursue the European Construction

Again, and in spite of the fact that better knowledge of the content of the text implies a higher level of awareness of the symbolic role the Constitution would play, this statement is widely supported even by the less well-informed (59%). It is in any case necessary to highlight that almost 3 in 10 interviewees in this group expressed no opinion in this respect.

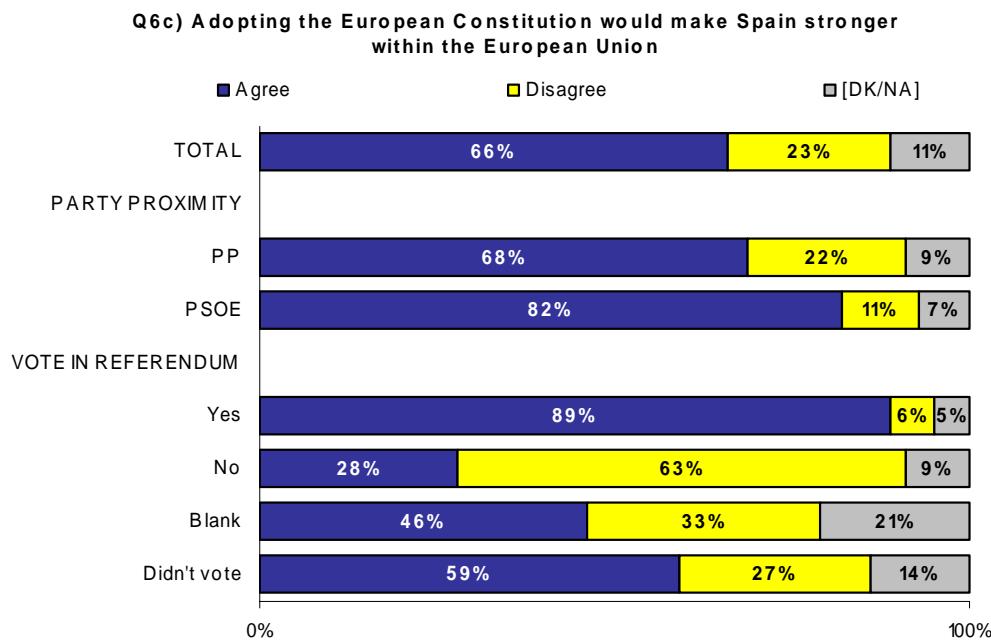

Support for this statement is also in the majority in all the socio-demographic groups identified. It is worth pointing out that, in each case, belief in the Constitution as essential in order to pursue European construction increases with age (75% of interviewees aged 55 or over compared with 63% among the youngest).

-The majority are convinced that the referendum result reinforces Spain's role at the heart of the European Union-

Source questionnaire: Q6c)

Spanish citizens are convinced not only that the Constitution is essential in order to pursue European Construction but also that the support it received in the referendum will lead to a reinforcement of Spain's role within the European Union.

Naturally, this idea is particularly strong among "Yes" supporters, principally voters (89%) and supporters of PSOE (82%). All in all, the vision of a Spain strengthened in Europe thanks to the referendum does not appear to be affected by abstention: 6 in 10 of those who did not vote believe that the adoption of the Constitution will nevertheless have positive effects for the country in Europe.

The citizens who voted "Yes" to a treaty which reduces the blocking capacity of many countries, including Spain, also tend to believe that it will have an overall strengthening effect on Spain's role in the European Union".

Quite apart from information about the structural reforms that the Constitution will introduce to the European institutions, in many cases support for the European Constitution has been seen by some political analysts as backing for the change in Spain's foreign policy under the Zapatero government, which has all along sought to emphasise its markedly pro-European intentions<sup>7</sup>.

-The European Constitution, a democratic symbol-

Source questionnaire: Q6f)

In more general terms, the European Constitution seems to be a symbol of democracy: at least, that is what 65% of interviewees thought, convinced that their adoption of it strengthens this political system.

Again, this is an opinion supported by a majority of interviewees in each socio-demographic and political sector, even though the young exhibit a larger degree of scepticism than the rest (36% do not seem to agree with this idea) although naturally the majority (60%) of those against the Constitution were not in agreement with this statement.

Q6f) The adoption of the European Constitution strengthens Democracy

To underline once again the importance of knowledge of the text when evaluating its implications: although 6 out of 10 "very well-" or "well-" informed interviewees appreciated the value of the Constitution as a democratic paradigm, this proportion fell to 45% amongst those who knew absolutely nothing about it.

3.3 The impact of the Spanish result on the forthcoming votes on the Constitution.

At the time of writing, in addition to Spain, the Constitutional Treaty has been ratified by a parliamentary procedure in Lithuania, Hungary and Slovenia. Naturally attention will now turn to other countries that have also opted to hold a referendum as a means of ratifying the text.

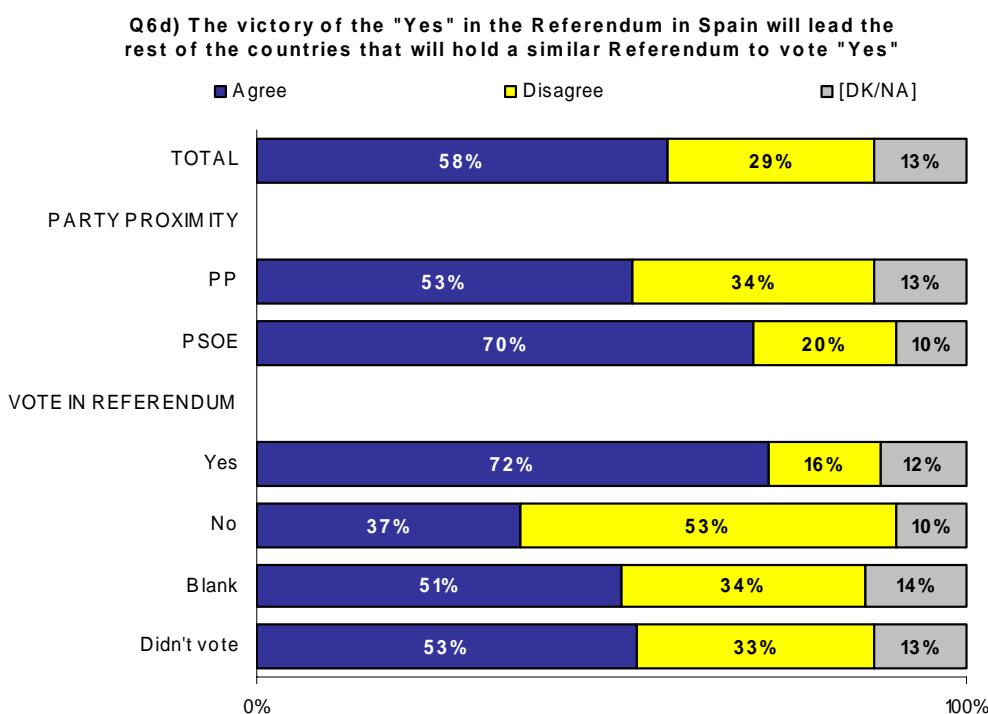

In this respect the Spanish result has awakened expectations about which the interviewees expressed themselves.

-A majority convinced of the potential influence of a Spanish "Yes" on the results of other European referenda-

Source questionnaire: Q6d) Q6e)

Almost 6 in 10 interviewees believe that the Spanish "Yes" will be reproduced in the other Member States that have planned similar votes. The results are even higher amongst the supporters of PSOE (70%) and "Yes" voters (72%).

In a more limited fashion but still with a majority, 1 in 2 supporters of PP and 1 in 2 abstainers share this vision of the Spanish result.

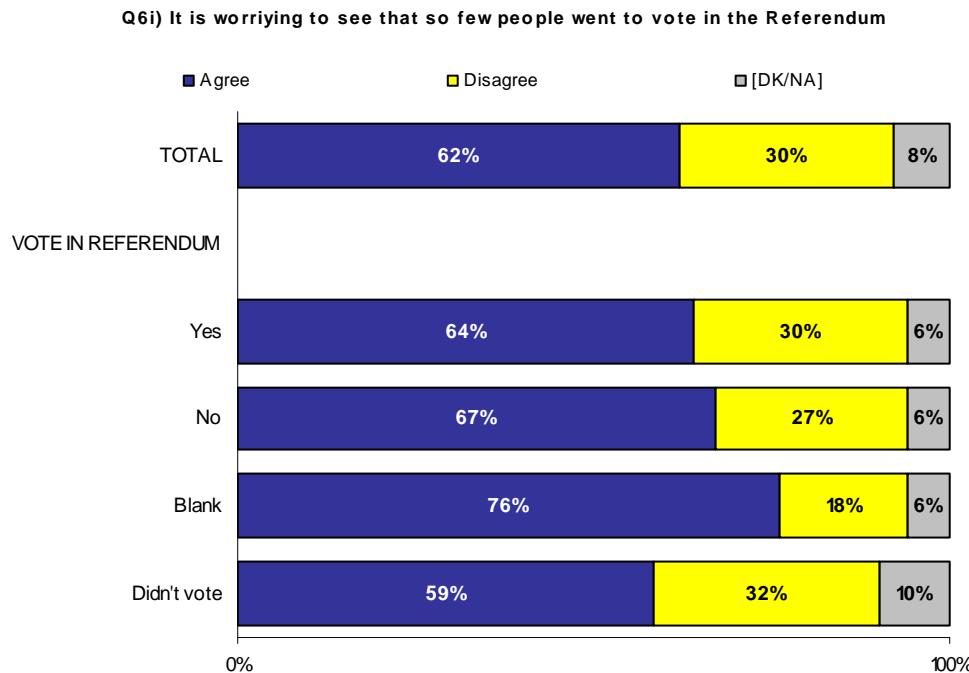

The Spanish are less clear about the possible effects of the Spanish abstention on other European votes. It is, as a matter of fact extraordinarily difficult to forecast in which direction Spanish abstention could influence the turnout in other countries.

This uncertainty is proved by a clear division in opinions, although the idea that the low turnout level need not affect other referenda seems to predominate slightly (47% as opposed to 41% who think the opposite).

Those who turned out to vote, tend more to think that the turnout of other Europeans citizens, called to vote in a similar referendum, will follow its own path, compared to those that abstained. This opinion is relatively stronger among those who supported the Constitutional Treaty.

Lastly, the abstention was worrying in the eyes of a majority of interviewees (62%), paradoxically even amongst those who did not vote on the 20th of February (59%).

3.4 Knowledge of the text

Throughout the study, for analysis purposes, we have used an index of information about the text based on answers given to a quiz-type question. Furthermore, we have analysed the influence that the level of information about the content has had in terms of voter turnout. We are now going to analyse the responses given to each of the statement proposed<sup>8</sup>.

-A completely insufficient knowledge-

On average, almost half of those interviewed answered incorrectly (25%) or could not give a specific answer to each of the constitutional provisions tested (27%). The rest of the citizens proved their knowledge of the European Constitution (47%). The following graph clearly shows that, far from having a solid knowledge, Spanish citizens are still unfamiliar with some of the key articles included in the Constitutional Treaty:

Q8. For each of the following statements, tell me if, in your opinion, it is true or false. It is planned in the European Constitution that ... (% thinking it is...)

<sup>8</sup> The test comprised three correct statements ("It is planned in the European Constitution that the position of a Foreign Affairs Minister of the European Union will be created", "At least one million citizens of the European Union can request the adoption of a European law", "A member state can leave the European Union if it wishes to do so") and three false statements (It is planned in the European Constitution that "the President of the European Council is directly elected by European citizens", "A direct European tax will be created", "National citizenship will disappear").

Although it is widely known that the European Constitution contains no plan to abolish national citizenship (with 70% of correct answers), or that the position of a Foreign Affairs Minister of the European Union will be created (50%), or that a Member State can leave the European Union if it wishes to do so (53%), equally the people who, erroneously, think that the European Constitution plans to introduce a direct European tax (35%) and that the President of the European Council will be directly elected by European citizens are in a slight majority.

It is also worth pointing out the high level of cases in which no response was obtained, especially in regard to the citizen's right of initiative (36%).

If we analyse in more detail the average percentage of right and wrong answers supplied, we may observe some interesting details that should be borne in mind in relation to communication about the Constitution:

- Ten percentage points separate the average number of men answering correctly (52%) from the average number of women (42%).
- The level of knowledge and the level of education are, logically enough, closely correlated: 53% of those who have continued their full-time studies until the age of 21 or older answered correctly, compared to 42% who did so among those whose education ceased at the age of 15 or younger.
- In terms of occupation, the self-employed and employees knew the text better than manual workers and people without a professional activity.
- Lastly, knowledge of the text of the Constitution appears to have been more widespread in large cities (53%) than in rural areas (41%).

4. Sources of information about the referendum.

We have been able to observe that a lack of information is the main cause of abstention, or at least the reason most frequently given by abstainers when explaining their decision not to vote.

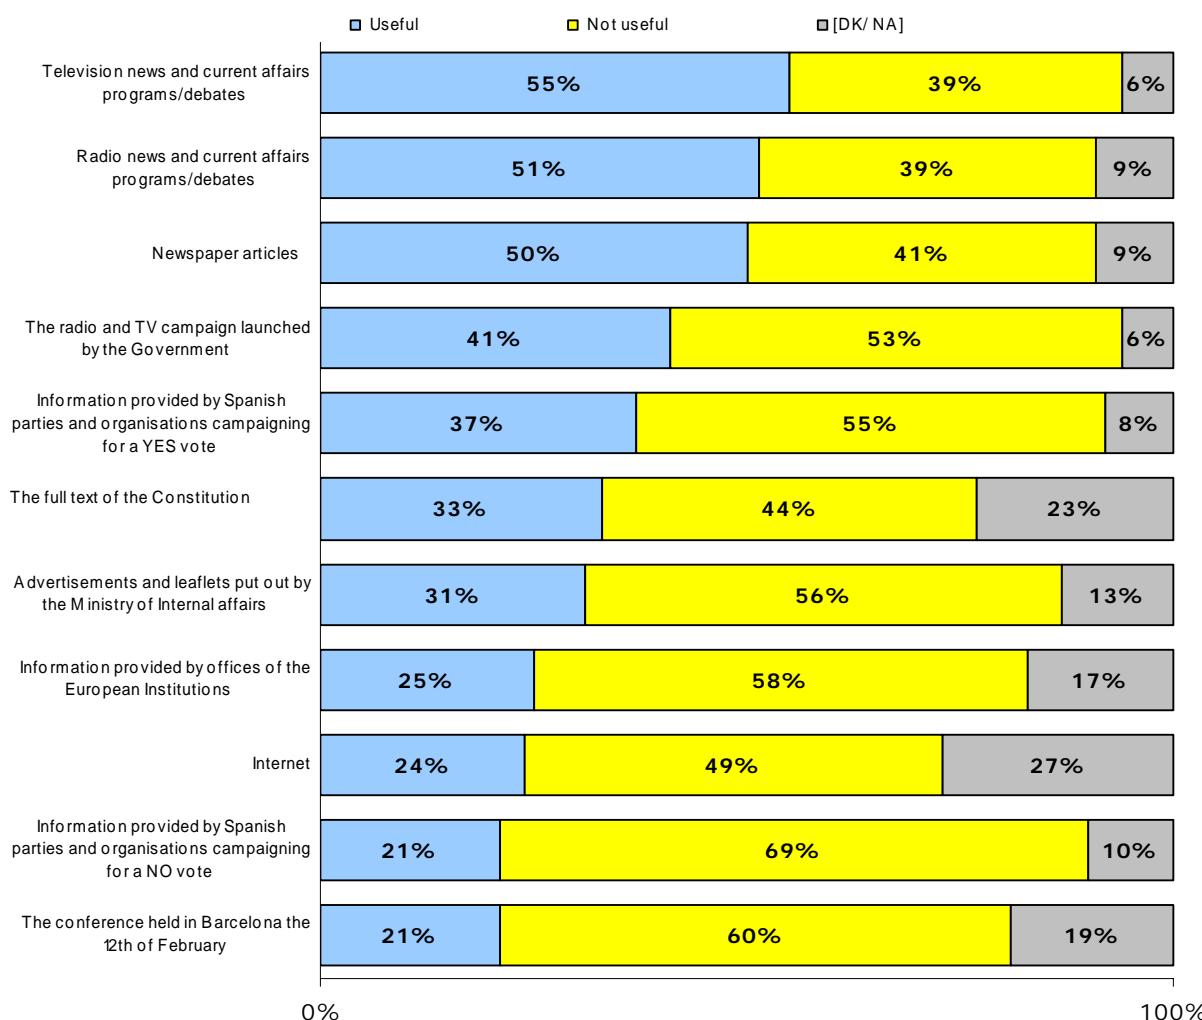

It is therefore interesting to analyse the efficiency of the different information sources used by the interviewees with regard to the referendum of the 20th of February.

Source questionnaire: Q9f); Q9g); Q9h)

-Communication media more useful than official information sources -

An initial glance at the results exposes firstly the limited effectiveness of institutional and official mechanisms which are usually put into operation before a vote of this kind; and secondly the relevance of the mass media, television, radio and press (in that order), as the media that appear to have demonstrated a more effective capacity for circulating information.

Q9. Please say how useful, if at all, you found each of these possible sources of information in the lead up to the Referendum held last Sunday ...

Around half of the interviewees confirm that the news as well as television or radio debates and press articles were useful to them in the lead up to the referendum.

The efficiency of other channels appears to be much more debatable: although 41% thought the radio and television information campaign launched by the Government was effective, only 31% thought the same of the publicity and leaflets distributed by the Interior Ministry and only 25% defended the usefulness of information sent directly from the European institutions.

At a party level, organisations which campaigned for the "Yes" vote come out slightly better (with judgments of the information provided being 37% positive) than the parties who opposed the Treaty (21%).

The Internet was only useful for 24% of those interviewed, while the conference organised in Barcelona on 12th of February with the participation of national and international political leaders was only considered effective by 21% of interviewees<sup>9</sup>.

One in three Spaniards interviewed thought that the information obtained directly from the complete text of the Constitution, distributed free on the initiative of some newspapers, played a valid role in preparing for the referendum.

A slightly more detailed reading of the data allows us to verify that those who supported the Treaty with their vote appear to have been relatively more susceptible or sensitive to information from official channels (43%) and especially from parties campaigning for the "Yes" vote (54%). All in all it appears that the communications media are, as for the other groups analysed, the most effective means of information.

In the same manner, if we cross reference these results with the level of actual knowledge about the Constitution we see that those who knew most about the text were more likely than average to stress the value of information from the press, television and radio (6 in 10 of the interviewees thought this).

Furthermore, this group proved to be much more critical than the average interviewee with respect to the information supplied by European institutions (74%), the Government via television and radio (58%), and the Barcelona conference (69%). An identical phenomenon was repeated when a judgment was sought on the effectiveness of information supplied by political organisations supporting the "Yes" vote (64%).

The Spanish experience appears to expose certain errors or erroneous campaign strategies.

Information is, according to the data, a key element in mobilising voters, and in this case it has not been communicated in a valid or efficient manner by the parties and official institutions to those taking part, or to those with an above average level of knowledge about the text.

The lesson that can be learnt for other, similar referenda is that even if the mass media seem to be the most efficient channel of information, the content of this information should first come from political parties and national and European institutions, thereby ensuring that citizens can handle all the necessary information prior to a vote of such crucial political importance.

<sup>9</sup> According to the latest findings of the General Media Survey (October-November 2004), the percentage of internet users in Spain is 33%.

CONCLUSION

On the 20th of February last, Spain held a consultative referendum on the Treaty establishing a Constitution for Europe. This resulted in the support of almost 8 out of 10 voters (76.73% compared to 17.24% for the "No"). Results of this post-referendum study show, without a doubt, that Spaniards sent a message of support to the European Union and that they voted more in line with their personal feeling about the Union than with regard to their opinion on the Constitution.

However, the clear "yes" result must be balanced with the fact that more than half of those eligible to vote did not take part in this consultation. It was indeed the first time for this country that a European Union issue was submitted directly to citizens for their approval.

It would be, in any case, extremely inappropriate to analyse these results in terms of conventional elections: referenda could appear to be sometimes uncertain for Governments, as shown by recent experiences in Denmark and Sweden on the Euro. Issues tackled in these types of consultations do not seem to arouse the same interest compared to parliamentarian elections for example. Besides, it could mobilise more opponents who often turnout just to demonstrate their disapproval of ruling parties. In the Spanish case, the lack of uncertainty regarding the final result and the fact of being faced with a less competitive election than usual (as the "Yes" was supported by both of the main political parties) figures among other factors of abstention.

A comparative analysis of turnout in European elections and in the referendum indicates moreover the existence of a structural abstention when it comes to European affairs: 70% of those who did not take part in the referendum did not vote in the 13th of June elections. In that sense, it seems that Europe remains a political and institutional entity from which many electors feel distant, even though they recognize the advantages of Spanish membership of the EU. This group is particularly significant amongst young people (63% did not turn out and almost 80% of them did not vote in the last European elections).

However, this study seems to show that the level of information on the Constitution has played an important role in the mobilisation of voters. Turnout seems to mainly nourish itself from groups who know the Constitution best and in general, non-voters claim that lack of information explains the reason why they did not turnout.

Almost half the respondents reproach what they perceived as a late launch of the campaign. In that sense, the "official campaign" conducted by political organisations and public institutions, seems to have played a less relevant and efficient role than that played by the media. Television, radio and the press appear to be perceived as the most useful channels when transmitting information. However, the content of this information has to come from political parties and national and European institutions. The Spanish experience shows that in order to mobilise citizens there is a need for sustainable effort in informing and encouraging debate on the Constitution.

TECHNICAL NOTE

Conduction of this survey details

This telephone survey FLASH EUROBAROMETER 168 "The European Constitution: Post-Referendum in Spain" was conducted for the European Commission, Directorate-General "Press and Communication"

It is a GENERAL PUBLIC FLASH EUROBAROMETER SURVEY, organized and managed by the PRESS Directorate- General, Unit B/1.

The interviews were conducted between the 21/02/2005 and the 22/02/2005 by the EOS GALLUP EUROPE Institute in Spain : TNS-Demoscopia

Representativity of the results

The national sample is representative of the population of 18 y.o. and above registered to vote

Sample size

The sample size amounts to 2014 respondents

A weighting factor has been applied on the national result in order to represent the national population of Spain, the result in the Referendum and the vote results in the last European Elections

In the report we have presented side by side the number of interviews:

- 1) Actually conducted in this country
- 2) Derived from the weighting in proportion of the population of Spain, the result in the Referendum and the results in the last European Elections

Interviews
Conducted (1)		Weighted (2)
2014	100%	2014	100%

Questionnaires

- 1) The questionnaire prepared for this survey is reproduced at the end of this results volume in French, English and Spanish (see hereafter)
- 2) The translation have been revised by the Institute listed above

Tables of results

* VOLUME C :

The VOLUME Ca presents the results with the following personal characteristics of respondents as breakdowns:

Sex (Men, Women)
Age (15-24, 25-39, 40-54, 55 +)
Education (15&-, 16-20, 21&+)
Occupation
Locality type

The VOLUME Cb presents the results with the following personal characteristics of respondents as breakdowns:

Political proximity
Vote in Referendum
Knowledge of the Constitution

Statistical significance of the results

The results in a survey are valid only between the limits of a statistical margin caused by the sampling process. This margin varies with three factors :

1. The sample size (or the size of the analysed part in the sample) : the greater the number of respondents is, the smaller the statistical margin will be;
2. The result in itself : the closer the result approaches 50%, the wider the statistical margin will be ;
3. The desired degree of confidence: the more "strict" we are, the wider the statistical margin will be.

As an example, examine this illustrative case :

1. One question has been answered by 500 people ;
2. The analysed result is around 50%;
3. We choose a significance level of 95 % (it is the level most often used by the statisticians, and it is the one chosen for the Table hereafter);

In this illustrative case the statistical margin is : (+/- 4.4%) around the observed 50%. And as a conclusion : the result for the whole population lies between 45.6% and 54.4 %.

Hereafter, the statistical margins computed for various observed results are shown, on various sample sizes, at the 95% significance level.
